ABSTRACT

Introduction- Dental implants have revolutionized the dental practices along the world, but with the evolving trends it is also a challenge to implement ideal implant placement strategies as the oral cavity is not always in the optimal condition. Hence, knowledge about mouth preparations is must for a successful implant placement. A proper evaluation of site is a prerequisite for successful implant placement. A thorough clinical as well as radiographic evaluation is must for correct diagnosis and treatment planning. In cases where the bone available for implant placement is insufficient vertically or horizontally, preprosthetic surgery is indicated based on oral conditions and need. Literature Review- This article covers a brief description about various mouth preparations that can be performed prior to implant placement, these include surgical procedures like Sinus Lift, Ridge Splitting, Distraction Osteogenesis, Inferior alveolar nerve lateralization and transpositioning and Guided bone regeneration each of them having certain indications and contraindications. Conclusion- A detailed knowledge about preprosthetic surgical procedures for implant placement not only helps to overcome clinical challenges related to successful treatment but also improves the prognosis. But the use of preprosthetic surgeries must be done judiciously only in cases where there is an absolute need for surgical intervention.

Keywords: Dental Implants, Mouth Preparations, Preprosthetic surgery, Surgical Procedures.

INTRODUCTION

Dental implants have revolutionized the general dental practice. It has not only brought an era of continuous evolution but also enhanced the durability and comfort of the prosthesis as compared to the removable alternatives. Successful implant placement requires adequate alveolar ridge dimensions, necessary to house the implant and provide aesthetics and function.

A proper evaluation of site is a prerequisite for successful implant placement. A thorough clinical as well as radiographic evaluation is must for correct diagnosis and treatment planning. In cases where the bone available for implant placement is insufficient vertically or horizontally, preprosthetic surgery is indicated based on oral conditions and need.

It is always better to correct the soft tissue abnormality rather than to circumvent the problem with an inferior prosthetic restoration. The goal of free prosthetic surgery is to modify the oral environment to make it free of disease and to make its form and function more compatible with the requirement of any prosthesis. The process and procedures may differ in each patient depending on the overall evaluation of the patient's oral cavity.

Preprosthetic surgery may increase the time required for the complete treatment but in long term, it not only enhances the prognosis but also increases the longevity of the prosthesis.

Therefore, prosthetic rehabilitation should aim at perfect harmony between white and pink tissues esthetics. There is a synergy between the smile, the skin and the sense of confidence that that along with having a beautiful smile.

LITERATURE REVIEW

There are many preprosthetic surgeries that can be done prior to the implant placement. A proper treatment planning helps to determine the ideal mouth preparation required for that particular patient.

The various preprosthetic surgeries are described below-

SINUS LIFT

Introduced by ZATUM in 1986 [1], it is a surgical intervention aimed at increasing the height of residual bone in posterior maxilla by repositioning the floor of the maxillary sinus in upward direction.

After surgical extraction in posterior maxilla, alveolar bone resorbs and inferior expansion if the sinus takes place, this is known as PNEUMATIZATION OF MAXILLARY SINUS.

It is of two types- DIRECT and INDIRECT

Direct sinus lift consists of osteotomies to create a bony window and either the medial rotation or removal of the bony window. Direct visualization and elevation of the sinus are done, hence the name direct sinus lift [2].

The procedure involves the general preoperative preparation and anesthetization followed by a crestal incision made along the alveolar crest from the tuberosity to the inferior border off the sinus, along with vertical releasing incision. The flap is then elevated.

The lateral access antrostomy is opened using round bur. The site is prepared resembling the shape of rectangle with round corners, the bone is then removed using rotary instruments. A bluish hue indicates close approximation to the sinus membrana, gentle tapping of bone helps to separate the bone and create a window. The exposed schneiderian membrane is lifted using a broad-based freer elevator or curettes. Graft material is placed under the membrane within the osseous cavity with loose compaction, overfilling is avoided as it may cause membrane tear and may also lead to decreased oxygen tension, restricted blood flow and may inhibit angiogenesis. The flap is then repositioned and sutured and post operative instructions are given.

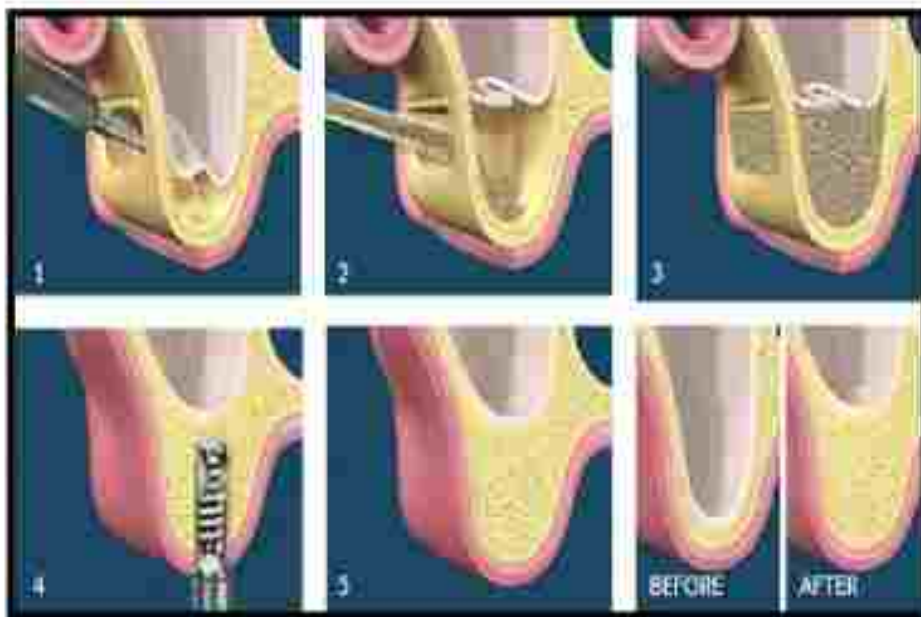

Fig 1: Direct Sinus Lift

Indirect sinus lift was demonstrated by SUMMERS in 1994, indicated only in cases when atleast 5-6mm of alveolar bone height is present and only a minimal bone height is required [3].

The procedure is almost similar to direct sinus lift, except that the elevation of sinus floor is carried by trans-alveolar approach using osteotomes to press the bone. This increases the height of bone while transversally condensing the alveolar bone for better bone density.

Implant osteotomy is performed in a conventional manner to create an osteotomy site leaving behind 1mm of bone between the site and sinus membrana. The osteotomes are then introduced progressively thus expanding the bone in vertical and transverse direction to create sufficient implant space.

The disadvantage associated with indirect lift is that the lack of direct visual control and the possibility of uncontrolled disruption of sinus mucosa. Also, it cannot be used in cases of large defects.

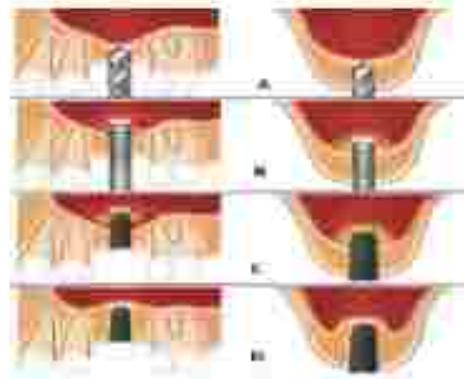

Fig 2: Indirect Sinus Lift

The various modifications of Indirect Sinus Lift include- Sinus lift system, antral membrane balloon elevation and Hydraulic Sinus lift technique.

DISTRACTION OSTEOGENESIS

It is also known as Callotaxis, Calvar Distraction and Osteo-distraction.

It can be defined as the procedure whereby a segment of the jaw is sectioned by osteotomy and gradually displaced by controlled movement to increase the height of an edentulous ridge.

It is based on the tension-stress principle proposed by Ilizarov [4]. In alveolar deficiencies, it was first used by Chin & Tooth. The gradual bone distraction creates mechanical stimulation which induces biological responses and consequently bone regeneration. This is accomplished by cascade of biological processes which may include differentiation of pluripotential cells, angiogenesis, osteogenesis and bone mineralization.

The main advantage of distraction osteogenesis as compared to augmentation is that the use of small distraction device that gradually lengthen the bone and generate new bone at the distraction gap with no need for a bone graft with the associated donor site morbidity. Also, it includes simultaneous expansion of both bone and soft tissue, greater bone lengthening and minimal resorption and relapse of the newly formed bone [5].

Distraction device classification-

1. Depending on the relation with skin surface—Internal or external devices
2. Depending upon type of anchoring tissues—Tooth borne or bone born or hybrid.
3. Depending on the vector direction—Uni-directional or bi-directional or multivector
4. Depending upon the purpose and site of distraction—Maxillary or mandibular or alveolar distracters etc

INTERNAL DISTRACTION DEVICES(IDD)

They are fixated directly to the bone. They are safer to wear for a period of several months as they do not create social discomfort and therefore, permit longer retention periods which contribute to better stability as compared to external devices. They offer a more predictable and precise rate of lengthening due to a direct contact to the bony segments. The major disadvantage associated is that they require a second surgery under general anesthesia for device removal.

Fig 3: Internal Distraction Device

EXTERNAL DISTRACTION DEVICES (EDD)

In this the distractor is placed outside the skin surface and is visible. Its advantage includes large movements & multivector movements. Distraction rods can be replaced regularly and they do not require additional surgery for removal. These are less comfortable to young patients as they are vulnerable to trauma during daytime and while sleeping. Also, it results in visible buccal scars and pin tract infections which may have a negative psychosocial impact.

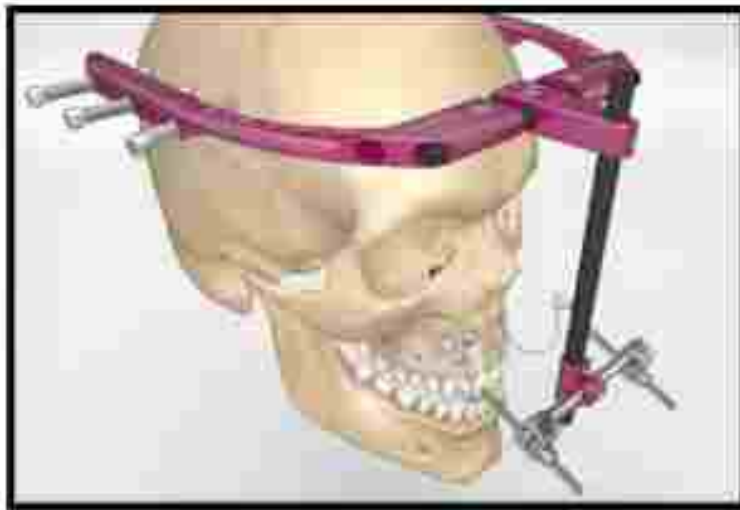

Fig 4: External Distraction Device

RIDGE SPLITTING

The technique of Ridge splitting and expansion was introduced in the early 1970s by Simon et al for horizontal ridge augmentation while maintaining the periosteal attachment by carefully expanding the cortical plates.

The alveolar Ridge Splitting expansion technique is proposed to create "SELF-SPACE-MAKING DEFECTS" within the bony atrophic crests. It is very useful in managing narrow edentulous ridges (>3.5mm) for implant placement with predictable outcome in maxilla and mandible. The less dense the bone, the easier and more predictable the bone expansion.

Consideration of Bone density, blood supply to alveolar process and wound healing are necessary before planning the procedure.

The procedure involves site preparation and anesthetization followed by a sharp midcrestal incision and raising a full thickness flap. The splitting of ridge is then performed using a wide variety of instruments ranging from scalpel blades to spatula osteotomes, piezoelectric surgical systems and ultrafine fissure burs. The separation of the bone is then continued carefully along with graft and membrane placement. The flap is closed and sutured back [6].

The various advantages include no need of a second surgical site, rare risk of inferior alveolar nerve injury and less pain and swelling.

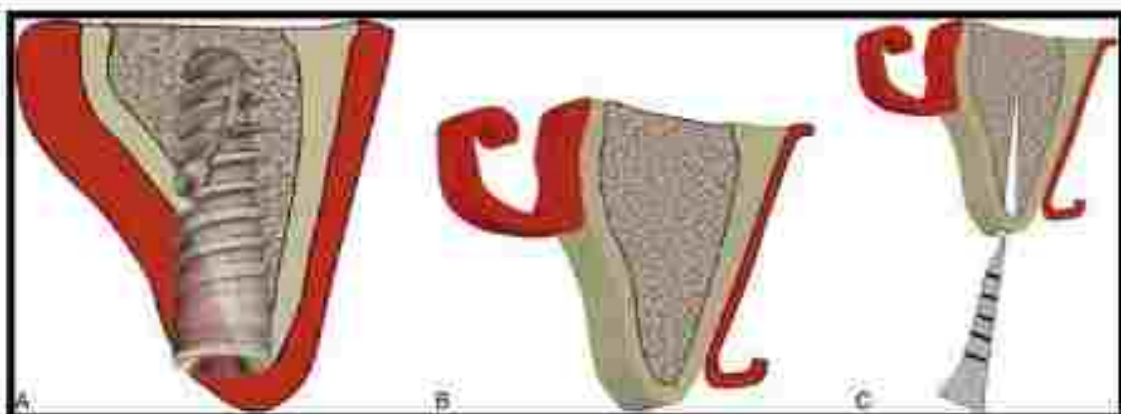

Fig 5: Ridge Splitting

INFERIOR ALVEOLAR NERVE LATERALIZATION AND TRANSPOSITIONING

Inferior Alveolar Nerve Lateralization (IANL) is defined as the lateral reflection of inferior alveolar nerve without incisive nerve traction i.e., preservation of the incisive nerve and lateralization of the inferior alveolar neurovascular bundle posterior to the mental foramen [7]. While, during the Inferior Alveolar Nerve Transposition (IANT) procedure, a corticotomy is done around the mental foramen and the incisive nerve is transected to allow transposition of both the mental foramen and the nerve such that the mental foramen is repositioned more posteriorly [8].

The first case of IAN repositioning was reported by Ailing in 1977 to rehabilitate patient with severe atrophy for dentures.

The procedure of nerve lateralization involves anesthetizing and placing a crestal incision with anterior posterior releasing incision is made followed by reflection of full thickness mucoperiosteal flap. The osteotomy site is prepared using a bur and straight handpiece with copious amount of irrigation. Straight and curved chisels are used to separate the residual bony bridge and remove the bony window. The nerve hook retractor is specially designed to free the IAN from its position in the canal. Umbilical tape or neurologic elastic type retractor is passed around the nerve bundle and used to lateralize and retract the neurovascular bundle. The implant placement is then done conventionally, nerve is then repositioned over the lateral aspect of implant and the flap is repositioned.

Fig 6: Inferior alveolar nerve Lateralization

For nerve transpositioning, in order to secure complete mobilization of the IAN, the incisive branch, located about 5 mm from the mental foramen, is sectioned. Then with the nerve fully lateralized, the dental implants are placed under direct visualization. Once the implants have been positioned, the vestibular cortical layer is replaced in those cases where an osteotomy has been performed, or the nerve is passively positioned against the implants in those cases where cortical drilling has been carried out. In either case, the emergence of the nerve becomes more distal.

GUIDED BONE REGENERATION

It is defined as the "Any procedure that attempts to regenerate lost periodontal structure or alveolar process through differential tissue response: barrier techniques, by using synthetic materials that may or may not resorb, to exclude epithelial ingrowth or connective tissue ingrowth that is believed to interfere with regeneration." It is a type of ridge augmentation in which, a membrane (nonresorbable or resorbable) is used to cover an area where bone graft healing or bone regeneration is desired. The concept of guided regeneration, or osteo-promotion, is based on the ability to exclude undesirable cell types, such as epithelial cells or fibroblasts, from the area where bone healing is taking place. The barrier membrane can be used with or without particulate bone grafts or and bone substitutes.

To ensure successful GBR, four principles need to be met [9]:

1. Exclusion of epithelium and connective tissue.
2. Space maintenance as the protected space is needed for hard tissue cells to regenerate bone that excludes the soft tissue cell during healing and maturation.
3. Stability of the fibrin clot- The initial blood clot formation and stabilization of graft particles will result in a predictable bone formation.
4. Primary wound closure- the wound closure in soft tissue can be achieved by primary or secondary intention. In primary intention, edges of the flapper brought close and are in the same position at before the incision while in secondary intention, the edges of the flap are not closely approximated, and the membrane of grafting material can be visually seen.

The procedure involves proper preoperative preparation to ensure proper antibiotic coverage before the start of the procedure and the site is prepared for surgery. After anesthetizing a total mucosal, periosteal incision is made. Perforation of cortical bone is achieved using round burs to facilitate angiogenesis and neovascularization. The area is carefully debrided and cleaned. Barrier membrane is than placed accompanied by bone graft and the flap is approximated back and sutured tension free [10].

The grafting materials used are broadly classified as Non-resorbable and Resorbable.

The Non-resorbable materials are used when a higher amount of bone augmentation is required, reinforced non-resorbable mem- branes are used. Reinforced membranes withstand the pressure from the surrounding tissues, resulting in the prevention of membrane collapse and allowing the bone to be regenerated during healing. They have a higher complication rate while the Resorbable materials have an advantage of eliminating membrane after healing, resulting in decreased morbidity, ease of manipulation and lower complications, but they have a lower success rate with regard to space maintenance. Resorbable membranes that are made of native collagen (non-cross-linking) show high biocompatibility resulting in good tissue integration and rapid vascularisation.

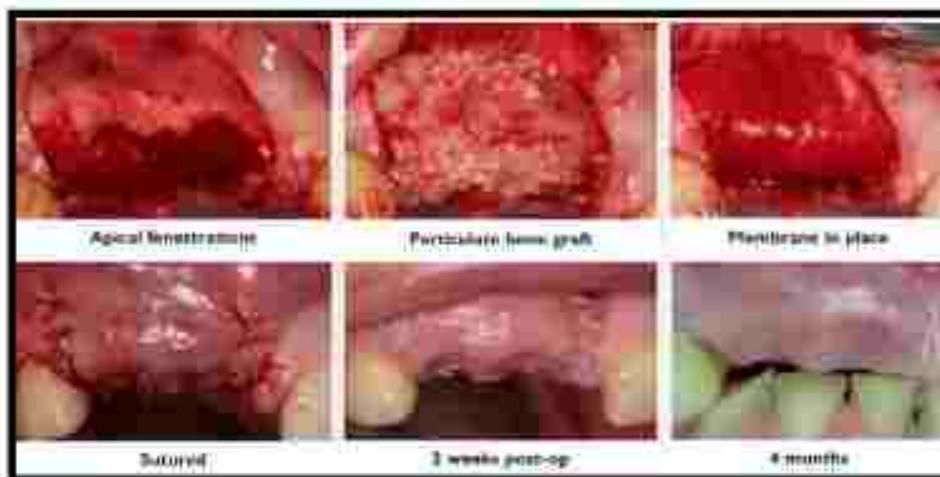

Fig 3: Guided Bone Regeneration

SUMMARY

The goal of free prosthetic surgery is to modify the oral environment to make it free of disease and to make its form and function more compatible with the requirement of any prosthesis. Pre-prosthetic surgery is a rapidly changing area of dentistry. Pre-prosthetic surgery thus serves as an adjunct for the foundation that enables fabrication of a well-fitting and comfortable prosthesis.

A thorough knowledge about indications, contraindications, complications as well as technique is must to help plan the prosthesis as well as educate the patient. The surgery must be planned with final outcome in mind. It is essential for prosthodontics to be well-versed with the latest surgical technique and equipment thereby improving the prognosis. But overzealous and unnecessary use of pre-prosthetic surgery may lead to loss of soft and hard tissue structure. One should make its use judiciously keeping in mind the general, physical, oral, mental condition of patient's while selecting the cases without violation of the basic Devan dictum of preservation.

(57) Abstract :

ABSTRACT [200] The invention Advanced Niti Instruments in the removal of Gutta-Percha for Root Canal Retreatment is a when removing Gutta-percha that has been obtained with two leaders. An effectiveness of low retreatment Niti systems (perhaps minimal retreatment files, B-Files) is evaluated. Study Plan: Postoperatory files were used to instrument sixty extracted single-rooted premolars MFTT. Six groups were created from the operations: Groups A, S, and K were obtained using Gutta-percha and AH plus. Whereas Groups L, C, and T were done so with Gutta-percha and flow recall sequester. M-Files and ISORefiles were used for groups L and A. B-file retreatment files were used for groups S and K, and postoperatory files were used for groups T and C. Sections of the teeth were created using an optical microtomography. One-way ANOVA and the Newman-Kuel's test were used in the statistical analysis at P < 0.05. The novel approach generated cleaner canal walls as compared to both existing retreatment systems. The main concern of treatment for failed root canal cases is retreatment without surgery. The procedure aids in fast removing the initial root canal filling, after doing further cleaning and sequestering. Since the root canal systems were not adequately prepared and filled, root canal retreatment is required to remove the canal and gutta-percha, filling points or providing acoustic energy that might be the cause of postoperative inflammation and post-retreatment sickness in some (file) of this is done. No instrument was able to totally remove all traces of postoperative and bacteria from the root canal walls, as was seen in earlier experiments. Additionally, the manual retreatment method in this study using M-Files and ISORefiles files generated cleaner canal as compared to the Premaier and B-File group retreatment files.
